“People can judge me for what I’ve done. And I think when somebody’s out in the public eye, that’s what they do. So I’m fully comfortable with who I am, what I stand for, and what I’ve always stood for.” Hillary R. Clinton

Survivor of Sexual Assault Fights Back Running on a Road to Self-Awareness

Hillsborough County, Florida—An ambitious woman travels over 1,300 miles to claim more attention as a scriptwriter. Her journey to writer recognition becomes an unexpected path to unemployment, poverty, and hunger; a path she would eventually find herself raped and incarcerated. Without representation of a lawyer, she rushes where accuse persons fear to tread.

Finding a way out and back is not so easy, as she falters through a courtroom of injustice and loses herself in a maze of official misconduct. Now that piles of stones are on the road, will a fateful detour lead her to the path of freedom?

During her movement, Quianna has requested for increase transparency and accountability—including questions about whether changes will be made to the Tampa Police Department’s hiring process, and whether current police officers will receive education regarding sexual violence in Florida.
